

The Little Town That Could

Once upon a time, there was a little town with a library so small that many of the town's children were turned away from their favorite summer reading programs. This library was so tiny that bookcases covered the windows, keeping it very dark inside, and the young children and their parents had nowhere to read together, and the older children had nowhere to do their school work, and lots and lots of people couldn't work on the library's seven computers.

For many years, the people of this little town wished they had a new, much bigger library. They talked about building a new, bigger library, and dreamed about what the new, bigger library would look like, and they even raised some money to help build the new library. But it was never enough.

Then one day, the townspeople found a way! The queen, known as California, would give them a great deal of money to build a library if the townspeople would come up with just a little bit. So the people of the town thought and thought and thought and then they had an idea. If everybody in the town gave a very small amount of money, and they put it all together, there would be enough to give the queen.

So that is what they did. And now this little town has a beautiful new library, where little children and big children and their parents and grandparents and all their friends can read and study and work on computers and take home books and tapes and even videos – all for free. And they all lived happily ever after.

And that's exactly what will happen when the townspeople of Folsom vote YES on Measure A!

Speaketh thou Elizabethan ...

Elizabethans, in Renaissance England, loved their language. They spoke it with practiced flourish and bold gestures. They especially enjoyed hurling witty insults. Here's how you can join the fun at the Faire:

First, never say a plain word when a flowery one will do. Use old verb endings, like "thinketh" and "wouldst." If you're stuck, simply say "It marvels me much."

Rather be insulting? Here's how: Choose one word from each of the following paragraphs A, B and C and speak them in order to the object of your wit.

A. bootless, craven, droning, fobbing, gleeking, lumpish, paunchy, reeky, roguish, spleeny, villainous, warped, weedy

B. bat-fowling, bettled-headed, boil-brained, clay-brained, crook-pated, hedge-born, knotty-pated, pox-marked, swag-bellied, tickle-brained, weather-bitten

C. barnacle, boar-pig, canker-blossom, dewberry, giglet, haggard, harpy, joithead, minnow, miscreant, wagtail

Now, don't be a gleeking, hedge-born canker-blossom!
